A New Place to Read

[1] At Midori Junior High School, many students liked reading, but the library was often crowded after school. Last spring, library club member Aya noticed an empty space near the school garden. She had an idea: Why not make a small outdoor reading area?

[2] Aya and her friends talked to their teacher. The teacher liked the idea but said they needed seats and a way to protect books from rain. The students did not have much money, so they asked families for old wooden chairs. They collected twelve chairs and painted them blue. A local carpenter checked the chairs and repaired two of them. The students also made a small box for books and put it under a roof.

[3] The reading area opened in June. At first, only a few students used it. Then the library club started a "Book of the Week" activity. Club members chose one short book and wrote a card about it. More students began to visit the area during lunch. Some students even talked about books with classmates they did not usually speak to.

[4] Aya was happy because the project gave students not only a place to read but also a new way to connect with others.
