Mina's Welcome Map

[1] On Monday, Mina saw a new student named Daniel standing in the hallway with a school map. He was trying to find the music room, but the map showed only room numbers. Mina walked him there. She remembered getting lost when she first came to the school two years earlier. That afternoon, she asked her homeroom teacher if she could make a clearer map for new students.

[2] Before drawing, Mina wanted to know which places were difficult to find. She made a short survey and asked twenty-four students who had entered the school that year. Fifteen chose the music room, six chose the nurse's office, and three chose the library. Mina and her friend Riku used colors and simple pictures to show each place. When they showed their first map to the principal, he liked the idea but asked them to test the map before printing many copies.

[3] They invited four new students to start at the entrance and follow the map to three rooms. On the first test, three students finished the routes without help. One student, Sara, stopped near the stairs because she could not tell which floor to use. Mina and Riku added a large arrow beside the stairs and a clear '2F' label. During the second test, all four students found the rooms, and Sara finished faster than before.

[4] The following week, the new map was placed beside the school entrance and put on the school website. Mina also started a welcome team with Riku and three other students. The team met new students on Monday mornings and answered questions that the map could not answer. Mina learned that a useful tool does not have to be perfect at first. It becomes better when its creators listen to users, test their ideas, and make changes.
