A New Life for Old Uniforms

[1] At Midori High School, many students bought new uniforms when they entered school. Meanwhile, uniforms that no longer fit older students were often left unused at home. Some were almost new, but families did not know what to do with them. After learning how much clothing is thrown away each year, members of the student council proposed a uniform reuse program. They hoped to reduce waste and help families avoid unnecessary costs.

[2] The proposal sounded simple, but the students soon faced several concerns. Some families were hesitant to donate because a name had been written inside the clothing. Others worried about cleanliness or felt uncomfortable receiving something that had belonged to another student. To protect personal information, volunteers removed or covered every name label. A local cleaner agreed to wash the uniforms at a reduced price, and the school arranged a private room where students could try them on.

[3] The first exchange day was held before the new school year. Families reserved a time in advance, which prevented the room from becoming crowded. Each person could take up to three items for free, but no one had to explain why they needed them. The organizers expected mostly first-year students to attend. However, members of the drama club also came to look for jackets and skirts for a school play. After receiving this feedback, the volunteers added a separate collection box for clothing that could be used in school activities.

[4] By the end of the year, more than 150 items had found new owners. The program saved families money and kept useful clothing out of the trash. Yet its most important result may have been a change in attitude. Students began to see used clothing not as something embarrassing, but as a practical resource that could support other people. The organizers learned that a successful reuse program requires more than collecting things: it must also remove the worries that prevent people from taking part.
