[1] In recent years, more companies in Japan have allowed their employees to work from home. Because of this change, some workers no longer need to live close to their offices in large cities, and a number of them have started moving to smaller towns in the countryside.

[2] This trend has brought clear benefits. Workers can avoid long, crowded commutes and pay much lower rent than in the city. At the same time, small towns that had been losing population gain new residents, and some local shops and schools that were close to shutting down have become active again.

[3] However, the change has also created problems. Newcomers sometimes find that the services they were used to in the city, such as large hospitals, are missing. Long-time residents, meanwhile, may feel that the new arrivals do not understand local customs, and building trust between the two groups can take a long time.
